Terrible Slau hter of Tots on the Erie Railroad.

There are Three Dead and Another is Dying.

Thrilling Story of How Five Little Ones Faced Death Together.

Five children crouching on a railroad track laid on the trestles of a bridge fifty feet above a swirling stream.

They are in the centre of the bridge. They have just stepped from the other track on which they had seen a train approaching. Hardly have they jumped Looking backward they see their three younger companions, pale, paralyzed with fear, glancing mutely after them.

With a heroism never surpassed, these two girls, heedless of themselves, jump back right in the road of the mass of rushing iron.

They have a moment to make one desperate effort to pull the younger ones out

The moment passes. The engine is among them, crushing, tearing, tossing, manging the tender little bodies.

Onward it rushes until the bridge is passed. Then it stops.

passed. Then it stops.

The engineer, reeling like a drunken man, staggers back over the bloody trail his machine has made.

Down on his knees he sinks besides the bodies of the three children who are dead. Strange to say, the two others have escaped with only slight injuries.

One, the only boy of the party, was knocked through the openwork of the bridge, and fell into the river below.

bridge, and fell into the river below.

This terrible tragedy occurred on the Eric Railroad bridge which crosses the Passaic River near Paterson.

Richard Warren is the father of four of the children who were in the party. Ho is a laborer and lives at 287 River street, Paterson.

Yesterday afternoon his daughters Mas aged twelve. Nelve aged six, Jennie d three, his youngest son Willie, d four, and Jennie Derniter, of 293 aged four, and Jennie Derniter, of 293 River street, slipped away from home to go blackborrying in Bergen County, across the Passaic. They filled themselves with the berries and then filled little tin cans to take

They decided to cross the bridge to When they had reached about centre of the bridge, on the west-ind track, a train rushed towards them from the east.

They saw it in good time, and merely tepped ha tily from the west-bound to the east-bound track, never noticing until alarmed by the shouts of the control to the control until alarmed by the shouts of of those in the fields along the river bank that there was another train thundering along behind them. Engineer Parmalee was in the cab with his hand on the throttle.

his hand on the throttle.

His train was an express. Owing to a curve in the road just before the bridge is reached, he did not see the children until almost upon them.

To stop the train all at once then would, in all probability, have wrecked the train, so he let her go.

What followed he told his passengers as he knell sobbing on the track by the little dead ones, after the tragedy was I saw them as if they were images.

saw the larger girls leap to safety, and a wave of joy swept through my heart. ''A prayer more fervent than I ever made before went up to heaven to help to l'aterson, and soon crowds of people went out to the railroad irridge. Tender hands had moved the little bodies to a place on the greensward where the mutilated little limbs where straightened out.

He struck no place near them, though, and before they could reach him he was scrambling through the shallow water for the shore. When he reached the land he seemed n dazel and kept going around in a circle.

"Where are the others? Are they dead? I want my sisters."

Ite kept repeating this over and over

Ris sister Jennie, the younger of the the city party, was not killed either She was knocked against the guard rail of the bridge and the cowcatcher ripped a long gash through her scalp, tore nearly all the hair from her head and laid the scalp open clean to the skuil.

There was a deep gash under her right eye and another in her neck. She was the conscious when picked up. She and her brother were removed in a carriage to the Ludies' Hospital in Pater-

He decided that the railroad company was in no wise responsible for the accident, as the bridge is not intended for foot-passengers, and is a doubly dancerous place since the local trains of the road were recently multiplied.

It was Mainte Warren and Jennie Berniter who so noby sacrificed their lives in the futile effort to save their little companions.

Two doors away a similar scene of grief was witnessed in the Warren household.
Mr. Warren is a laborer also, but not so thrifty as Mr. Derinter. In fact he has not money enough to bury his two little ones.
